- AARS evaluates new rose varieties for beauty, disease resistance, growth habits, etc. After undergoing a two-year trial of plant performance in official test gardens throughout the United States, the superior performers receive the designation of AARS award winners.
- Winners are then shown in official AARS display gardens like at Shore Acres a year prior to release for sale to the general public. Thus we have the 2011 winners for display in 2010. They will be available to consumers next year.
- While the AARS award is a widely accepted designation of quality for roses, not all new roses are entered in the program and most "old garden" and "heirloom" type roses have never been evaluated. So the lack of an award does not necessarily imply any lack of beauty or garden usefulness for a particular rose.
- As always, where you plant your rose, how you plant it, and what care you give it afterward, will have the greatest impact on whether your plant is an award winner for you.
